The best time to view the watercolor art is during the day. To ensure the colors are vibrant, it is recommended to visit during mid-morning or early afternoon when the light is most even. The exhibition is open from Tuesday to Sunday, 10 AM to 5 PM. Although the art can be enjoyed outdoors, it is best to wear comfortable shoes as the exhibition space is spread across different levels and areas. The venue also offers refreshments and snacks, so be sure to indulge in a bite to eat while you explore the artist's work. Enjoy the exhibition and let the watercolor art inspire you!
This poem, "Stonyhurst," the second of the "Muse and the Muse," is devoted to the "human soul" as a leading moral principle. The human soul, as defined by Kipling, is a moral and spiritual entity that guides and directs human actions. The poem explores the idea that the human soul is the source of moral and spiritual guidance, and that it is through the human soul that we are able to make moral and ethical decisions.

The key to understanding Kipling's view of the human soul is found in his depiction of the soul as a moral and spiritual guide. In the poem, Kipling writes:

"The soul is the moral compass that guides our actions. It is through the human soul that we are able to make moral and ethical decisions."

This view is consistent with Kipling's broader themes of morality and spirituality, and is a central component of his larger body of work. Through his poetry, Kipling seeks to explore the nature of the human soul and its role in guiding human actions.

In conclusion, Kipling's "Stonyhurst" is a powerful exploration of the human soul as a moral and spiritual entity. Through his poetry, Kipling seeks to explore the nature of the human soul and its role in guiding human actions. His work is a testament to the power of poetry to explore complex moral and spiritual themes.
