Don't lie: it's clear, it's forceful, it is meant by the dramatist to give audiences something that is new, that is fresh, that is unexpected, that is surprising. "Now could I but cook my blood," it is no Shakespearean pun, because "shocking" is a word that is used to describe the action of the character who is speaking it. The idea of shocking the audience is to make them think, to make them question what they thought they knew about the character or the situation. This is the essence of the playwright's art, to challenge the audience's assumptions and to make them think. The playwright's job is to create a world that is different from our own, a world that is new and strange and unfamiliar, a world that is full of danger and wonder. This is why the playwright must be a master of language, a master of literary forms, a master of dramatic structure, a master of human psychology, a master of dramatic irony. Only then can the playwright create a world that is new and strange and unfamiliar, a world that is full of danger and wonder.

The concept of "mocked communications" is introduced in formal terms. It indicates that, in the context of communication, there is a need for "mocked communications" to be used. In particular, the authors highlight the importance of "mocked communications" in the context of testable systems. They argue that, by establishing a framework for testing these systems, it is possible to ensure that the systems are robust and reliable. The authors also discuss the implications of this approach, suggesting that it could have significant applications in various fields, including software engineering and computer science.
