England is missing from Soldier's Home because, as Krupps discovers in this story, the English are not mentioned in the story, and the reader grows to care for young Blake. The novel is set in the American South during the Reconstruction era, and the story centers around the lives of several young boys who are sent to a military school to learn the skills they need to become soldiers. The story is told through the eyes of young Blake, who is one of the students at the school.

The novel is a classic American Civil War novel, and it has been praised for its vivid description of the Civil War and the lives of its soldiers. It is a moving story that explores the themes of flowering, loss, and redemption. The novel has been translated into several languages and is widely read around the world.

In fact, it is Mrs. Krebs's contempt for men which helps explain why she is so hard to please and why she disapproves of her son's marriage proposals. Krebs's main interest in the novel is his own decline as a married man, and Mrs. Krebs herself is fond of reminding him that he is not as young as he used to be, and her brothers often warn him about the dangers of marriage. However, in Krebs's view, marriage is a necessary evil, and he is not opposed to it as such. What he fears is that marriage will prevent him from carrying out his private plans and ambitions.

We have no way of knowing, however, whether or not young Helen is being made to feel that she cannot consent to marriage. It seems likely that Krebs's own observation early on, "The world they are in is not the world of their fathers' day," is equally true for Helen and her mother. The novel is a portrait of a generation in transition, and Krebs's character is emblematic of this change. He is not entirely unhappy with the status quo, but he is also not entirely content with it, and he is therefore in a state of constant anxiety and uncertainty.

The novel also explores the theme of change and the cost of progress. Krebs's own life is a case in point, as he struggles to adapt to the new world of science and technology. He is not entirely comfortable with the new order, and he is often critical of its effects. However, he is also aware that the old world is not going to go away overnight, and he is therefore caught between two different worlds. The novel is a portrait of a man in transition, and it is a portrait that is both poignant and timely.
